A little three-year-old who was summering and the floor timbers, instead of running from side to side, thus anchoring the building, ran from from to rear, making a pressure all on those points, leaving hothing to hold it. If the timbers were from one building to the other there would be no give, but, being from front to rear, the least give in the front or rear walls would let one end of the timbers out of its place, thereby weakening the whole building.
